ABORIGINAL TO NOWHERE: song cycle of the post-modern dispossessed

Abstract:
In 1948, after many years living with the Wonguri-Mandjigai people, Ronald M. Berndt published an English language translation of a non sacred song of the Sand-fly Clan: the Song Cycle of The Moon-Bone. In 1977 Les Murray wrote his own version based on the Berndt translation The Buladelah-Taree Holiday Song Cycle, a white mans revision. 2016: Murray’s revision gets a revision, a homosemantic emulation (a translation from English into English retaining the cadence, mood and sound). Aboriginal To Nowhere transgresses Murray’s vision of city folk holidaying on grandma’s farm and signals a contemporary poetry of dispossession and anti-sentiment, ventures into transliminal territory and explores those in-between places of perpetual generational change; it is a text hyperaware of incremental shifts in the semiotic simulation humans call reality.

Biographical Note:
Brentley Frazer is a contemporary Australian poet, novelist, academic and editor. He holds a MA (writing) from James Cook University and will complete a PhD (creative writing) from Griffith University in 2016. Brentley’s experimental memoir Scoundrel Days is forthcoming from University of Queensland Press (UQP) March 2017.

Keywords:
Homosemantic emulation of a translation of a semi-sacred Australian Aboriginal song cycle – transliminalist poetry – experimental Australian poetry
Aboriginal to Nowhere

Song Cycle of The Post Modern Dispossessed

. . . girls walking close to murder discard, with excitement, their names. ~ Les Murray

1

The Citizens Netflix & chill in their minimum eight hundred thousand dollar concrete sky-coffins in the river city; streaming a hot series in air conditioning; Gen Y & Millennials staying in for dinner.

Plate up & Instagram, change the rotation with a PlayStation control, post a clever meme on Facebook, consider the likes, speculate on advertising revenue & think of the friend requests.

Now the netizens you-tube epic fails in the nation where the massacre never ended, the official story books read 1920; unfamiliar with how history is written?

that doesn’t matter - Beyoncé has a new album on Tidal.

Overhear the neighbours; back here for the holidays.

They have a mate staying at the Marriott in the same suite where Barack Obama laid down his presidential head & they’re getting ramped on Smirnoff, craft beer & pills before they hit the clubs.

It’s bleak here, the architecture condemned by skyline designers a place where beggars warm their hands at the shrine of remembrance lest we ever forget our forefathers died for this system.

Back then the council hired some Sydney architects into Greek Revival & other poison modernist aesthetics.

We have cultural heroes, most of them appropriated—but hey, it’s the smart state . . . ever noticed the syncopation of Queensland & Police man, that’s no mistake, rather formulaic like everything in this metropolitan estuary; corpses rising from the muddy banks like prawns.
City cats moored on moon bones, ice junkies under the ghost gums on South Bank & the indigenous protest their semantic assimilation from the big goanna on Boundary street, now free to roam & vote, just don’t use the facilities where it’s twenty bucks for a beer.

2

It’s footy season, the village idiots in their jester suits provoking cops outside Suncorp stadium.
The freeway north like a hallway though the last standing old growth forest preserved for tourists, crowded by the great benzene breathing serpent coiling from Southport to Milton; to fill out old Lang park with fifty thousand people.
The halogen brighter than the fires of the north, faces all washed out in cold light, rainbow-winged cane beetles powdered with ash.
After the roars in unison that sound across the suburbs above the helicopters, sirens & night birds, the wildlife, a maelstrom of screaming clowns pour out to fight over taxis & black-lit buses, in a hurry to secure a spot in the standing-room only pubs.
Remember, it’s an adventure, don’t ever assume otherwise; your dreams in the neon of the casino lights don’t matter, only dollars.
You can buy any experience & die while reaching for the ultimate rush.
Or you can find that one thing & do it on repeat until your numbers come up.
I have a memory, or read it somewhere, of a dugong rising from the deep, it’s great Jabba body like a storm cloud above the reef

& I floundered almost drowning as ocean fluted in my snorkel my father laughing in that Darth kind of way that happens when you talk under water, said it’d scared some sharks away. I hadn’t even noticed.

This is metaphor;
the song-cycle of the post modern dispossessed, the homeless in their own home, or aboriginal to nowhere.
Seduced by masks. Anglo sons studying to become gangsters or judges,
looking down from high rise apartments, a surgeon’s view of the bridge, the arteries.
What do you do when your million dollar view gets boring, move on, sell it to a foreign investor for better money tell your mates, high five, buy some cocaine.

3

Out here where the road signs have bullet holes & the CCTVs have relaxed their gaze, leave the car cracking in the heat & wander up the creek awhile.
The cool green & kookaburras laughing calm nerves burred from city life, the overcrowded streets; but these poisoned streams & denuded fields stolen in unrecorded frontier wars will soon conurbate, landscaped, old colonial & artificial.
Who wants to get depressed about it? Make some rain sticks from nature’s bones.
Is it worth it, this game of thrones?

4

The crows noticed us first.
Rising up & yelling we disturbed them, fuck you fuck off they shat on the roof of our Tucson, tried to tear off the aerial; we noticed later the fuzzy reception. A weird clear trail of bird waste like dehydrated rain drops on the windshield.

We’re heading north now, back to Brisbane; doing one hundred on the New England, hit a kookaburra as it alit from the grass of the shoulder, smashed a headlight, made us worry about karma. Those birds partner for life.

A discussion about road kill, hundreds of massacred marsupials. Talk about the north where my parents live, they string up ghost nets in the canopy so possums & koalas can cross & not get cleaned up by a b-double or greyhound bus; however the cassowaries still suffer, splatted over the bitumen in the unforgiving northern summer.

For weeks after returning to the city, in our back yard a kookaburra sat on the hills & laughed in the window.

Hey dad, you were born in 1950, when your father got back horny from the war impregnated with horror & he only operated a radio off the coast of New Guinea; but the Japanese bombers, he said, roared over them like God yelling at Moses.

O Christ, war stories us kids cried in unison & he darkened, sucked his barley-sugar harder in the front seat, put his foot down & ran over two dogs playing in the gutter. I’ll never forget it, on our way back from fishing on Mon Repos beach in the middle of turtle season, when it’s forbidden but he didn’t give a shit, dreaming about barbequed trevally trumps everything to him.

He had a pension, both as a veteran & a line man for the Post Master General; claims to have laid the telecom cables all the way from Cairns to Sydney.

When he died recently the R.S.L attended his funeral, laid down his slouch hat & shaded his grave with a plaque of war medals. They said a few words, how his service was important for Australia.

What about our mothers? Poets rarely mention them.

My grandma dragged my grandad to a flap tent in a drought starved field to find Jesus among the social refugees. A hundred men there who saw their friends turned to mince on the western front knelt & prayed for forgiveness, not particularly thankful they survived.

They returned home just now, the neighbours drunk & playing a game of I’ve Never Ever, larking about in a kiddie pool with a beer bong in their underwear.

They only left at eleven & they’re back already, woke my kids again & I’m swearing out the window but they ignore me, I’m just a grey beard, a boring parent.

This attitude & vernacular swagger, all talking like valley girls or Beavis & Butt-head; it reminds me of the eighties when all the black kids acted like Niggas With Attitude, wearing those Sox caps but we don’t play baseball in this neighbourhood.

& someone is vomiting over the fence, the girl I saw earlier twerking topless on the steps in blue Bonds boy legs & the kid who claims to be a personal trainer but he’s built like a bowling pin whistling you shoulda put a ring on it.

Of course the revenue hunters come; I didn’t call them, sirens on & everything, four squad cars & a paddy wagon.

The music cuts, right on the lyric for all the girls that got dick from Kanye West & the party is laughing, the cops can’t stop that drunk chick cartwheeling up the sidewalk.
Then the dawn, broken with the Rage theme from a static television car alarms & dogs barking, as Sunday begins.

7

A strange man stalks the markets like a scowling boy; he’s wearing an akubra that’s never seen a cattle yard or the bush in muster it has a hundred tourist pins & political ribbons & he’s clutching a radio wrapped in a plastic bag, a mop & bucket.
I saw him in the shadows of the city shouting something about the war down the concourse of central station.
His dog has walked half way around this continent nation on concrete & a diet of white bread, her ribs exposed; involuntarily emancipation from the state.
East of certainty, that’s for sure, like a child disappearing from a public toilet block or that nurse at the magic show.
Did you read about the guy who shot himself during The Watchmen?
Suicide in the theatre for real, truth & fiction bleeding together like the edges of shadows, blasting the reality bedrock, coal seam mining the alluvial fabric. Not him though, that strange man who weaves like a dingo that’s chewed off her trapped foot through the throng of farmer’s market hipsters & women in yoga pants.
I bet he’s seen real terror, killed a man or two.

8

Another day in the data mines, it’s all I have to dream about, getting screamed at by an irate customer on the complaints line.
Calls himself Osborne, says he’s in orbit on Percocet sourced from the dark net, only ten bucks a tablet.
The cold rains of indifference, a dogs eyes that hate you on the other side of the fence.
A lone white cockatoo burned in an esky.
Lost in news print & visual pollution on the trip home.
Busted umbrella in the gutter.
Walking across King George this guy in greasy adidas with waiting room tatts of anchors & ships tried to pick pocket us; stared him down with eyes just as hungry as his.
The billboard-sized big screen showing a film clip of some kids in the ghettos.
But what can I do about it, struggling to make ends meet myself.
O for some entertainment not this sentimental shit,
the music & the lyrics
don't match the visuals; The pop star gyrates, shakes her hips.
It's social consciousness as marketing tool,
the rich mocking the poor considering how much spent on the film crew & production.
What do you reckon?
You’re an armchair anthropologist with your fingers in the sockets of popular culture . . . give us an opinion.
The cicadas, buzzing mains transformers, fuzzy reception here on the fortieth floor.

Went walking on the banks of the Brisbane River & saw coming up out of it an immortal being reborn here a thousand times; took the form of an ibis caught in a six pack ring, dancing like T’googala
    The Wraith Wind, not the search engine.
& it gets fragmented here, the black dog howl drowns all other sounds; no escaping that atmospheric riptide as it drags you down.
Camels come like steady spectres drifting in without a sound, drifting in like plagiarised half-remembered lines on the edge of forgotten towns.
The elders sit in sorrow, the ever presence of the hunters & their arrows,
in the shadows of the overpass.
In your present form, Eternal Being, you are an angry cynic on a park bench with a sherry flagon.
        & I love you.

10

That homeless year freezing in an abandoned warehouse in Northcote
writing poems to the beat of anxious alcove pigeons & the shriek of trams. Spending the dole on drugs & a weekly pizza.
Almost got caught stealing a fifty meter extension lead from Mitre Ten.
Climbed through the roof to the dance studio next door, at night,
  to steal electricity for a bar heater.
All I could see was the disappearing wings of my guardian angel.
Visiting John, a lapsed rabbi in Balaclava to buy skunk for twenty a gram, the hall always full of Jews still seeking guidance, but he’s a folk musician now only interested in flogging CDs & weed.
Watched a kid graffiti this is the new notorious in an interesting electric red cursive on the train station wall.
My squat mate, a body modification artist into scarification between girlfriends & showers, he’s from a ruined aristocracy has an air of wounded pride, like a curlew with an arrow through it. He says he has to buy the biggest condoms. He boasts a lot; is gorgeous for a boy.

Is comfortable with his sexuality. He regrets his Prince Albert because now he has to sit when pissing. He’s hardly fractured, originally from New Zealand. The Kiwis seem comfortable with Maori place names.

They seem happier over the there.
He says it’s because everyone is poor & they don’t give a damn.

We smoked D.M.T on a mezzanine in a broken light bulb.
Saw dragons & yowies contorting in the corners.

Raining as I arrive.

Walk two kilometres through the bush to campus.
Soaked to the skin.

Didn’t bring an umbrella.
Sunshine when I left.

Figures slump through the tint.
Toads in the pond traps on a golf course.
Crows steal the balls.
The lecturer flicks through stations.

Bulldoze dream time for a freeway.
Scroll through my photos.
An apostle bird on a fence.
Rabbits & prickly pear.

My children.
Generational displacement.

Urban refuse.
Sagging gates.

Collapsed footpaths.
Piles of windscreen glass.
   An old video of a farmer saying: having a king is the only thing that separates me from all those black fellers.
Footage of war.
   Back when education was an end unto itself.
Still raining.
   Run along the bush path through the poisoned foliage.
Figures half seen in the ticker at the stock exchange.
   The way the bus tunnel lights kaleidoscope on your hair.
The way you guard your name braving the sharks grey shadows every night on your way home.

What stalked the highways of the 1970s stalks the freeways of the twenty teens.
He’s sitting there in a Bedford van at Byron Bay indifferent to the gulls eating a jellyfish.
He has her name from the bulletin board lift wanted tear off a tab & he’s watching her skin darken in the sun.
Deep in the bush her lonely screams will go unaided like a ghost phone vibration in the pocket of a man with phantom limb.
   & her skin will burn, never to heal again.
The indigenous goddess exits stage left.
I read somewhere that in Australia you are never more than two metres from a snake.

My people of the Beaten Akubra of the Oil Band & the Black Cockatoo Feather punched through felt & of weathered brows, eyes strained for clouds, of old names like James or Henry.
   You are not my people.
My people of the Holden Torana, of the Ford Charger of the Metal Band & Fluffy Dice on the rear-view mirror of the Bogan Mother & Bevan Father, fists perpetual ready clenched to strike
of eighties names like Clint & Trevor.
   You are not my people.
Are you my mother, Australia? Always there outside my window, creeping in with your desert tits your burnt sienna, your yellow ochre.
   Are you my mother, City?
With your inroad freeways & friendly hotel billboards—a home away from home
a breakfast just like grans—a dinner of slogans
   a welcome bed, Wi-Fi & cable, overnight or longer.
Are you my mother, Cafes & Bars with your glitzy citizens all dressed for show.
Antisocial music, conversation pointless, imported dance moves & disenfranchised lyrics, lost on you.
   & lost on me.
Are you my Father, sunburnt country, land of cattle bones of armoured fish & camouflage, the Southern Cross, the blue & white & red of outback dust.
Are you my father, sun burned farmer city slicker, simple folk, intelligentsia, illegal by boat, immigrant faggot, white invader, abo . . . social misanthrope.
Be my father, give me history . . . I don’t know what I am doing here, crumpled in the window of every passing bus.
Home is where the baby screams & the possum in the ceiling keeps you awake for days.
Home is not Australia, with all it’s potholed highways & unmarked graves full of broken hopes.

...
Research Statement

Research background
Where homage and theft intersect, on that transliminal threshold shimmers a gossamer of ethics where the influenced becomes the influencer and the lineage of literature continues; the transliminalist author appropriates everything within a given semiotic world and invents new writing.

Research contribution
The author of this text places himself and his reader under surveillance; of balaclavaed security guards, the technofeudal gaze of machines, the known, the unknown, dark masters, the new magicians and cultural guardians. In doing so arises Transliminalist poetry; a poetry that distills the subtle but persistent feeling of being out of place and institutionalized within language. Capturing the eerie and forlorn atmosphere of streets, marketplaces and cinemas usually bustling with people but now abandoned and quiet. Hypothetical conversations compulsively playing out in your head. A state of exhaustion inspired by acts of senseless semantic violence. Quotidian explorations celebrating imagist informality. Metaphorical iconoclasms. The awareness of the smallness of your perspective.

Research significance
Aboriginal to Nowhere inhabits the space between cultural narrative tensions and explores that threshold. One step from the most ancient land on earth across an aluminum door track and into Aldi. Beneath a post modernist umbrella in the shadow of colossal politics, of great writers admired for their singular senetism, but then, this Aristotelian TETRIS game of emotional vectors near drove me to silence. Tetris teaches us that if you try to fit in, you disappear. Stimuli from supraliminal pollution undergoes a transliminal leak across the threshold to the subliminal consciousness and there wrecks havoc on self definition. This poem re-mythologises contemporary Australia and engages with all sides of the story.

Notes
Transliminal ~ a hypersensitivity to psychological material (imagery, ideation, affect, and perception) originating in (a) the unconscious, and/or (b) the external environment.

List of works cited
Berndt, RM 1948 ‘A Wingga-Mandjakai Song Cycle of the Moon-Bone’ Oceania, 19:1, 16–50
ABORIGINAL TO NOWHERE
Song Cycle of the Post Modern Dispossessed
© Brentley Frazer 2016